Stockholm Syndrome

The term “Stockholm syndrome” refers to a phenomenon in which hostages held captive for extended periods of time form emotional bonds with their captors, sometimes even aiding them or passing up escape opportunities. A likely explanation is that hostage situations (26). According to psychologists, hostages facing the possibility of death feel as dependent on their captor as an infant is on its mother. Their captor can thus appear less as a ruthless oppressor and more as a generous savior. In the Swedish hostage-taking incident that gave the syndrome its name, one of the captors threatened police by saying he was going to shoot a hostage in the leg. The hostage reported feeling immense gratitude to the captor for choosing to wound rather than murder him.

Although Stockholm syndrome appears to be rare and is regarded by medical authorities as merely a subcategory of other psychological disorders, it has entered general usage as a description for a situation in which someone shows unexpected—and seemingly irrational—sympathy for an oppressor. When, for example, it was revealed that well-known Austrian abductee Natascha Kampusch had wept and mourned upon learning the man who had held her captive in a basement and tortured her for years was dead, public concern for her well-being evaporated and she began receiving large amounts of hate mail. Psychologists, however, tend to interpret getting on friendly terms with one’s captor as an effective survival strategy that could have an evolutionary basis, since abducting mates is believed to have been common in primitive societies. Even so, Kampusch’s case demonstrates that, to the general public, sympathizing with one’s captor (27).

Law enforcement officials are keenly aware that Stockholm syndrome (28). This aspect in particular has the potential to greatly impact the outcome of a hostage crisis. In crisis negotiation courses, law enforcement personnel learn that the sympathy captives feel for their captors is frequently reciprocated. Skilled negotiators therefore employ manipulation strategies such as asking captors to report to them on hostages’ health condition in order to induce compassion for the victims. If victims’ mind-set and behavior further encourage such feelings, it is even less likely their captor will harm them.

- (26) 1 are difficult for victims to discuss

- (28) 1 is only a temporary phenomenon
2 can work both ways
3 occurs among themselves as well
4 affects only certain people

Hollywood and China

As US box office revenues continue their decades-long slide, movie theater attendance has been skyrocketing in China, with foreign films shown there accounting for 46 percent of the market share. Gross earnings for these films can easily reach hundreds of millions of dollars. Hollywood movie studios, therefore, have increasingly been turning their attention to the Chinese market. Some experts, however, point out that (29). Hollywood studios take home approximately 50 percent of North American box office totals. Strict revenue-sharing regulations in China, though, mean the studios get only 25 percent of the total Chinese take. Consequently, despite the Chinese market's impressive size and growth, its contribution to the bottom lines of Hollywood studios may be exaggerated.

Hollywood studios' increasing reliance on the Chinese market can also be a gamble. China has no rating system, instead relying on a state-sanctioned body to decide whether movies are suitable for the viewing public. Content deemed offensive to China's moral and political values can be denied release there. While guidelines on matters of sex, violence, and the supernatural are provided, they (30). In fact, it is not uncommon for productions that have made all the requested changes to still be denied permission to be shown, leaving them unable to earn revenue that investors had been counting on. Former diplomat Robert Daly points out that "China might object to anything—its censors don't explain their decisions."

Targeting the Chinese market has also been viewed as a form of American soft power in China, bringing American values into the Communist nation despite the resistance of its authoritarian government. It seems, however, that (31). In the 1990s, for example, the film Seven Years in Tibet was a hit in the United States and helped stir up sympathy for a movement advocating Tibetan independence from China. Today, however, the perception that China's burgeoning market is essential to a film's profitability means investors would be unlikely to fund such a politically sensitive film. Hollywood studios now routinely alter their films to make them more appealing in China, adding Chinese roles and creating more scenes that incorporate Chinese characters and culture.

Enoch Powell and Immigration

On April 20, 1968, Enoch Powell, a British politician, delivered a speech to fellow Conservative Party members warning of the dire consequences of mass immigration from Britain's former colonies in South Asia, Africa, and the West Indies. In the 1950s, Britain had encouraged immigration to address labor needs, but after a decade, chronic housing shortages were causing local authorities to deny accommodation to newly arrived immigrants, and many private landlords were rejecting them outright. The 1968 Race Relations Act, however, was poised to make any form of race-based discrimination illegal. It was upon this issue that Powell based his objections, claiming landlords would, in effect, be forced to accept nonwhites into their homes. Citing conversations with his constituents, Powell argued such legislation could lead to the marginalization of Britain's white, native-born majority, and quoted one voter as saying, "In this country in 15 or 20 years' time the black man will have the whip hand over the white man." The speech went beyond criticizing Britain's immigration policy, calling for tighter controls along with voluntary repatriation.

Although Powell's words triggered little hostility among grassroots Conservative voters, several of his senior colleagues, fearing the possibility of a backlash, threatened to resign if Powell was not removed from his ministerial position. Conservative Party leader Edward Heath had no choice but to dismiss him, effectively ending Powell's prospects of ever rising to higher political office. The Times newspaper rebuked Powell for having "appealed to racial hatred," and indeed, whether he had intended to stoke those fires or not, physical and verbal assaults against immigrants multiplied following his speech. Moreover, it soon became clear Powell's views resonated with the populace: a Gallup poll taken shortly after the speech showed 74 percent of respondents agreed with Powell, while only 15 percent disagreed. Economic concerns were undoubtedly a factor, as British industry was showing signs of decline, and working-class communities increasingly feared immigrants would take away jobs and drive down wages. Ironically, despite the scorn the Conservative Party's leadership heaped upon him, Powell's speech likely helped it regain power in 1970.

Recognizing a potential minefield, politicians steered clear of the subject of immigration for the next few decades. In 2008, Nigel Farage became the first mainstream British politician to speak up for Powell, pushing back against the notion that racial considerations had underlain Powell's stance. This sentiment has been echoed by Powell's biographer, who draws a distinction between immigration and race. But such attempts to rehabilitate Powell have been met with opposition from those who believe he deliberately played on race-based fears to fuel tension for political gain. And, in any event, his predictions that white Britons would encounter discrimination or racial reprisal in their own country have proved patently untrue: multicultural Britain is largely peaceful and prosperous. Though Powell claimed, in the 1960s, that "integration of races of totally disparate origins and culture is one of the great myths of our time," he has been shown, 50 years on, to have been out of step and on the wrong side of history. These days, the notion of what it is to be "British" is as elastic as the shifting makeup of Britain's citizenry.

- (32) According to the author of the passage, a major motivating factor behind Enoch Powell's speech was his belief that
- 1 the longer immigrants remained in Britain, the higher the priority they should be given by landlords when trying to find accommodation.
 - 2 the Race Relations Act would put landlords in an unfair position by denying them the right to refuse potential tenants based on their ethnicity.
 - 3 the government should stop distracting citizens from the wider issue of Britain's housing problem by focusing only on race and immigration.
 - 4 the government had failed to recognize that immigration was no longer necessary from an economic point of view and should therefore be ended.
- (33) What conclusion can be inferred in light of the immediate aftermath of Powell's speech?
- 1 The leadership of the Conservative Party was out of touch with the general public on the issue of immigration.
 - 2 Regardless of the controversy surrounding Powell, it was obvious the Conservative Party was unlikely to regain power.
 - 3 Even if Powell had given up his position and quit politics, a number of his senior colleagues would still have resigned.
 - 4 Conservative politicians were correct to assume that to speak publicly on such a topic would make their party lose popularity among the public.
- (34) In what respect does the author of the passage believe Powell was "on the wrong side of history"?
- 1 Despite his biographer's claims that he was driven by a desire for political power, it is now widely accepted that his motives were mainly personal.
 - 2 Seeing the damage done to his career, politicians became convinced Conservatives would never be on the winning side in immigration debates.
 - 3 Powell's repeated claims that he made no distinction between immigration and race have been disproved by his biographer.
 - 4 Contrary to his beliefs about British society, the idea of national identity has evolved in step with changes in Britons' races and backgrounds.

Language and Emotions

In his 1872 book The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals, Charles Darwin, the father of evolution, argued that emotions are behavioral and physiological reactions that help humans and animals survive and evolve. Darwin believed emotions are unconditioned responses to external stimuli and theorized that all humans across languages and cultures demonstrate the same specific, involuntary facial expressions and behaviors for basic emotions. Most modern perspectives are based on Darwin's belief that emotions are hardwired, and many scientists believe the language used to describe emotions developed as a means to communicate experiences and innate mental states. More recently, however, a few researchers have argued that emotions are actually constructed through language, experience, and culture.

The theory of constructed emotion, proposed by neuroscientist Lisa Feldman Barrett of Northeastern University, in the United States, holds that emotions are formulated by the brain rather than existing from birth. Barrett notes a lack of solid scientific evidence supporting Darwin's view, and points out that, anatomically, the brain is not structured to automatically produce a certain emotion in response to a given stimuli. Rather, multiple networks within the brain collaborate to combine visual, auditory, and other types of sensory data with memories and learned cultural concepts in order to build mental simulations of the world. This process is used to assign meaning—including emotional significance—to new perceptions received by the brain. Barrett offers the example of the brain's response prior to an exam, when one individual may associate increased heart rate and sweaty palms with the feeling of "anxiety" based on past experience, while someone else might recognize that feeling as "determination." If emotions were hardwired at birth, she says, everyone would associate the same emotion with the same situation. Barrett acknowledges that people are prewired with basic notions of pleasure and distress; however, she believes concepts of emotions like "anxiety" and "determination" are learned. The way people label emotions, as well as the breadth of emotions they experience, varies depending on their experiences and culture, and the situations they encounter.

For Barrett, it is clear that language in particular has a significant influence on how people experience and frame their emotions. Language is considered the foundation that facilitates the acquisition and implementation of concept knowledge. Every language has developed its own concepts to label feelings that result from the interplay of behaviors, physiological processes, bodily sensations, and context. The word "schadenfreude," for example, was borrowed from German because English lacked a specific word for the feeling of happiness that arises from another person's troubles. According to Barrett, since the term became part of the English language, more English speakers have been experiencing schadenfreude. When it comes to perceiving emotions, she says, "If you know a word, if you hear the word often, then it becomes much more automatic, just like driving a car. It gets triggered more easily and you can feel it more easily." This can also happen when people move to a different country and adopt a new language and culture; they begin to internalize concepts of emotions that are prevalent in their new environment.

According to Charles Darwin, emotions

- 1 evolved separately across different languages and cultures and resulted in different ways of sharing experiences.
- 2 originated simultaneously with language as an alternative to the body's purely physical reactions in various situations.
- 3 are universal reactions involving physical responses that occur automatically when people encounter specific stimuli.
- 4 are learned responses that enable humans to communicate mental states, behaviors, and experiences to others.

The theory of constructed emotion holds that

- 1 although the vast majority of emotional concepts are prewired in the brain, a small minority can be restructured to some degree by memories.
- 2 mental models built up by the brain can be utilized to interpret sensory information and generate emotional responses to experiences.
- 3 the variation in brain anatomy among individuals accounts for the differences in their emotional reactions to the situations they encounter.
- 4 since only one emotion tends to result from one physical reaction, it is possible to predict with certainty how the brain will react to stimuli.

What is implied by the reference to schadenfreude in the third paragraph?

- 1 There is a strong correlation between a person's ability to relate to the emotions of others and that person's ability to acquire new skills.
- 2 The frequency with which words representing emotional concepts are used in a language has little influence on other aspects of culture.
- 3 Language affects the way people's brains process experiences by helping them to moderate or suppress their emotional reactions.
- 4 Exposure to new concepts can aid people in identifying unfamiliar feelings, allowing them to experience a broader range of emotions.

Operation Gladio

In 1990, evidence emerged of a secret army in Italy known as Operation Gladio. Gladio operated under the authority of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), a military alliance formed by Western European and North American nations to counter the threat of an invasion by the numerically superior forces of the Soviet Union. Trained and equipped with hidden arms stockpiles, Gladio members were a “stay-behind” army intended to form the nucleus of an armed resistance in the event of a Soviet attack.

Soon after Gladio became public knowledge, it was revealed that similar networks existed in other NATO countries, and even in supposedly neutral countries such as Switzerland. These networks were established by European military intelligence services in conjunction with the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). They were covert, unaccountable to national legislatures, and, according to a resolution by the European Parliament, operated “completely outside the law.” Unsurprisingly, this caused a great deal of controversy when it came to light. However, Europe’s political leadership largely sidestepped the scandal and remained silent. Despite widespread calls for a full investigation, only Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland launched independent parliamentary inquiries into the stay-behind armies. US president George H. W. Bush refused to comment.

When Gladio’s existence was exposed in 1990, it came about as a result of Italian judge Felice Casson’s investigation into acts of domestic terrorism in Italy during the 1970s. Casson revisited an unsolved car bombing that had killed three police officers in the village of Peteano in 1972 and had originally been blamed on a left-wing terror organization known as the Red Brigades. Crucial to the original investigation had been the report of a police explosives expert, who asserted the bomb had been homemade. Casson, however, revealed the attack to have been the work of a neofascist group known as Ordine Nuovo. Vincenzo Vinciguerra, a former Ordine Nuovo member, confessed to the crime, and it was further revealed that the police explosives expert had not only deliberately misled authorities about the explosives’ origin but had himself belonged to Ordine Nuovo.

By gaining access to confidential government archives, Casson was able to establish that the explosives used by Vinciguerra had been issued by NATO and acquired from a Gladio arms stockpile near the city of Verona. Italian prime minister Giulio Andreotti had, on more than one occasion, denied allegations about Gladio’s existence, but the Verona stockpile was a smoking gun that contradicted his previous assertions and forced him to admit what he had

The uncovering of Operation Gladio led to a major political scandal because

- 1 after holding parliamentary inquiries, several countries accused NATO of violating their neutrality and ordered the withdrawal of Gladio forces.
- 2 it was revealed that the United States had pressured European politicians not to discuss Gladio for fear it would cause disputes among NATO countries.
- 3 the existence of Gladio showed that the public had been misled regarding the probability of a Soviet attack.
- 4 even though it was a capable military force, Gladio did not operate under the authority of national governments.

(39)

What did Felice Casson’s investigation into the 1972 Peteano bombing reveal?

- 1 Italian prime minister Giulio Andreotti had not been telling the truth in his previous statements about Gladio.
- 2 Some members of right-wing organizations such as Ordine Nuovo had actually been agents who belonged to left-wing terror organizations.
- 3 Although Gladio had at first been focused on domestic military defense, its activities had shifted to intelligence-gathering in the Soviet Union.
- 4 Italian police had been collaborating not only with Ordine Nuovo agents but also with members of left-wing groups.

been aware of for decades.

Casson became convinced the Peteano bombing was part of what has been called a “strategy of tension” meant to weaken the influence of left-leaning political parties and organizations in Europe. These were seen as a destabilizer of democracy as strikes, student protests, violent demonstrations, and left-wing political victories rocked Italy. Casson claimed many Gladio members had been recruited from neofascist organizations, and when the Soviet invasion that Gladio had been created to combat failed to occur, they turned instead to combating the perceived threat of the growing left-wing influence in their country. Gladio members began carrying out false-flag operations—terrorist attacks with the intent of causing the blame to fall on the shoulders of left-wing organizations such as the Red Brigades. Casson alleged they were seeking to incite unrest in order to create a backlash against left-wing groups and parties, causing a rightward political shift and making the populace more accepting of authoritarian government measures.

According to historian Daniele Ganser, director of the Swiss Institute for Peace and Energy Research, the CIA was complicit in false-flag attacks on innocent civilians carried out by members of Gladio. Ganser cites not only extensive circumstantial evidence but also highly placed sources in the Italian intelligence community such as General Gianadelio Mal etti, who served as the head of military counterintelligence, and the Peteano bomber himself, all of whom have testified that Gladio committed terrorist acts with the involvement of the CIA.

Ganser’s claims, however, have drawn criticism. Fellow academic Peer Henrik Hansen accused Ganser of producing “a journalistic book with a big spoonful of conspiracy theories” that fails to substantiate its accusations. Philip Davies, a professor of intelligence studies at Brunel University London, echoed this by accusing Ganser of inadequate research and failing to place Gladio’s formation in “the appropriate historical context.” Central to criticism of Ganser is the fact that he based his findings on “U.S. Army Field Manual 30-31B,” which has been exposed as a hoax document created by Soviet intelligence services. The United States Department of State itself commented on this, stating that “Ganser treats the forgery as if it was a genuine document.” While it is true Ganser’s primary source lacks credibility, the damning testimony, the CIA’s history of using false-flag operations elsewhere in the world, and the fact that government archives on Gladio remain sealed make it nearly as hard to dismiss the idea of CIA involvement in Gladio’s actions as it is to prove it.

Which of the following statements best describes the “strategy of tension” mentioned in the passage?

- 1 An effort to oppose the spread of left-leaning political groups by manipulating public opinion in favor of right-wing parties and organizations.
- 2 A way to weaken the ties that had formed between less extreme left-wing groups and various terror organizations.
- 3 An attempt to magnify the conflict between left- and right-wing organizations in order to undo the compromises they had reached.
- 4 A system of placing neofascists into left-wing terrorist groups so they could work to divide them and reduce their effectiveness from the inside.

(41)

What conclusion does the author of the passage draw about Daniele Ganser’s theory?

- 1 Ganser’s failure to convince his peers of the validity of his thesis has more to do with political bias among academics than with a lack of solid evidence.
- 2 Even though Ganser offers an unreliable source as the basis for his claims, other factors indicate that they should not be disregarded.
- 3 Ganser is likely correct about the origin of the source that he uses as the basis of his claims, but it is unlikely he will be able to prove this.
- 4 In spite of the CIA’s acknowledgement of Ganser’s claims, his faulty analysis makes it harder to believe his theory as a whole.
