Over the past century, Japan has urbanized rapidly. These changes have been highly beneficial, especially in terms of the economy, convenience, and the environment.

First, urbanization is the driving force behind Japan's economic growth. Millions of city dwellers provide the enormous workforce necessary to staff factories and offices that are the backbone of Japan's economy. Additionally, urban construction projects have contributed greatly to economic development.

Urbanization has also made people's lives more convenient. Urbanites have better access to stores, public transportation, and a host of other things that make life easier. Additionally, Internet access is better in cities, so people there can easily obtain the information that is so essential in today's society.

Many people believe cities are bad for the environment, when, in fact, the opposite is true. Studies show urbanites drive less, live in smaller homes, and use less energy for heating and cooling, which leads to less carbon production on a per capita basis. Green solutions to environmental problems are also more likely to be developed by corporations based in cities than by individuals in the country.

Although the benefits have not come without costs, the effect urbanization has had on Japan's economy, the environment, and the daily lives of Japanese people has clearly been positive.
